

Biography Leo Wainhouse

Leo Wainhouse has worked for the Washington State Department of Health since 1978. He earned his BS degree in Bacteriology from Washington State University in 1977 and began his career with Health designing and implementing bacteriologic studies of commercial shellfish growing waters. In 1982 he moved into the health physics field with the Office of Radiation Protection. He has been involved with such diverse projects as closure and remediation of two uranium mills, project manager for the development of numerous environmental impact statements and responsible for radioactive materials licensing of all major public and private research and development laboratories in the state. He is presently the Radiological Emergency Response section manager with the Office of Radiation Protection.